
Reverse Phone Number Lookup Provides Easy Access To Cell Phone Owner Details

There may be more than one reason why you need to track down a phone number. Reverse phone lookup for landline, cell and other line types is your best bet when it comes to looking up phone owner info.

Chicago, IL (prHWY.com) October 19, 2010 - Reverse phone lookups are a great way to find out more information about a particular number that has called your phone or appeared on your spouse's or child's cell phone caller ID. You can perform a free reverse look up to get some basic details about almost any number, such as its registered location and phone service provider, etc.

If the number belongs to a land line - in other words, it is a published number, you can further check the name and address of the person or business to whom it belongs. For toll-free numbers, in most cases, this info is also available for free.

Cell phone numbers, while unpublished and unavailable in public directories because Sprint, Verizon and other mobile providers do not publish a wireless directory, can still be traced by using a private directory service.

Back in the "old days" before the Internet, the only way to conduct a reverse cell phone look up was to hire an expensive private investigator. And private investigation services are still available for people who need to track down a restricted number. But in most cases, you will be able to identify that number on your own by using one of the available directories and online tracking tools.

If you already have the number you need more information about, simply use the free reverse lookup widget that will check public and private databases to find name and address. If the number is restricted or blocked, or private call, you can use some tips found in this post on tracing blocked numbers. By optimally using all these resources, you will definitely save time and money.
